Walk into any building today and there will be one drinking fountain, and two bathrooms; one for males and one for females. Every citizen has the right to walk into any restaurant or store and be served. Enter any school and there will be students of all races attending without protest from the community. This has not always been the case. In this new essay, Jeana Banka unveils the power of Martin Luther King's speech, "I have a Dream." The Civil Rights Movement has been a huge part of America's history, especially with just years ago electing the first African American president. Check out Banka's rhetorical analysis paper today and see the impact one man, and one speech can make on an entire people.
