A photography gallery is a building with one or several rooms, usually of a well-lighted nature that provides a space as well as atmosphere for photographers to display an array of their work. Often a photographer gallery will present one or more photographers works simultaneously, while giving the general public an opportunity to experience a noted photographers works. Also, a photographers gallery is a place where the photographer can meet the public and premier a collection of his new and old work, while educating the public about the style, nature and purpose of the collection. A small fee is often charged at larger photographers galleries; when it is run by a non-profit group usually no charge is given.

Ann Shumard was the curator of the collection of Karsh's photographs in display. By presenting the Karsh photographs at eye level, Shumard gave the Karsh exhibit the intimate character it deserved. Shumard excelled in her choices of Karsh photographs which spanned his more than sixty year career.
